BLACK HISTORY

Links to the past

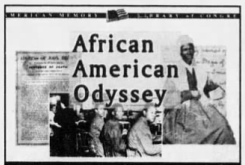

February is Black History Month, and most students in the United States will spend some time during the next few weeks reading about important undertakings and people such as the Underground Railroad and Martin Luther King Jr. To complement this work, we've compiled a selection of black history sites that not only discuss slavery and freedom, but also recognize black Americans' influences on the arts, media, business, medicine, sports, military and every other aspect of our society.

AFRICAN AMERICAN ODYSSEY memory.loc.gov/ammem/aaohtml
Using historical documents, photographs, drawings, fliers and other materials, this superior site leads visitors through the history of blacks in America. Starting with slavery, the site follows the quest for equality through the antebellum period, the Civil War, World War I, the Depression, World War II and the civil rights movement. Links to two related Library of Congress sites worth visiting are on the homepage—African American Perspectives and African American Mosaic. ★★★★

AFRICANS IN AMERICA

THE BLACK PRESS: SOLDIERS WITHOUT SWORDS
www.pbs.org/blackpress
We couldn't choose between these two excellent PBS sites, so we've included both. Africans in America is done in signature PBS style—a mélange of well-chosen documents, images, quotations, biographies and commentaries. Together, the effect is a startlingly clear account of both the history and the culture of the time period from 1450 to 1865. The Black Press site is devoted to the journalists and newspapers that gave a voice to an underrepresented population. Read biographies of journalists and histories of newspapers, or browse the Timeline and Interactive Activities. Both sites also feature educational resources, such as teacher guides and ideas for students. ★★★★

The African American Odyssey compiles materials from the Library of Congress.

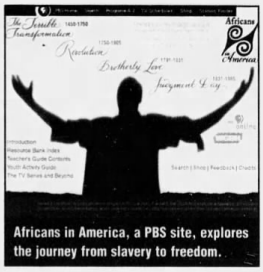

HARLEM 1900-1940
www.si.umich.edu/chico/harlem
Drawn from the collection of the New York Public Library's Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, this site from the University of Michigan offers a detailed look into Harlem in the early part of the 20th century. Click on a date in the Timeline for significant events, or wander through the Exhibition. Entries are divided into categories—Activism, Writers & Intellectuals, Sports, Business, Arts and Community. Look here for information on Zora Neale Hurston, Marcus Garvey and Madame C.J. Walker. The Resources and For Teachers sections provide good ideas and sources for classroom projects and discussions. ★★★★

IMAGES OF AFRICAN AMERICANS FROM THE 19th CENTURY
digital.nypl.org/schomburg/images_aa19
The New York Public Library's Digital Schomburg collection complements rather than competes with the site above. This is an elegantly designed site with a simple purpose: providing a window on the world of black Americans in the 1800s through photos and artwork. Among the images: A young woman in cap and gown for college graduation, slaves on the auction block and the wedding of a soldier and his bride. ★★★★

AFRO-AMERIC@'S BLACK HISTORY MUSEUM
www.afroam.org/history
Using neatly organized categories, this site walks you through some important areas of black American culture, ranging from the "whitening" advertisements of the 1920s and 1930s to the Million Man March of 1995. The interactive exhibits here focus closely on specific topics, but in every section the text contains links to additional information. For example, on the Jackie Robinson page, links provide details on the Negro Leagues, Robinson's family and his stint in the army. ★★★

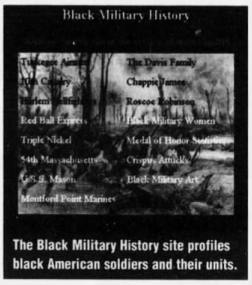

BLACKBASEBALL'S NEGRO BASEBALL LEAGUES
www.blackbaseball.com
The Negro Baseball Leagues were, for many years, the only professional outlet for black baseball players. This site takes an in-depth look at everything that made the leagues great. You can buy league memorabilia here or just read about your favorite team or player. The History section is instructive and illuminating, and the site recommends other resources and links for more information. ★★★

BLACK FACTS ONLINE
www.blackfacts.com
If you want to find out what happened in black history on any given calendar day, this is the site for you. An easy-to-use search engine allows you to input any date or keyword to search for important events. Or, pick a category, such as Arts, Education, Family, Business or Medicine, set the date for "any" and get a list of interesting topical facts. This isn't the most comprehensive site for information on black history, but it does have unique factoids. ★★★

Africans in America, a PBS site, explores the journey from slavery to freedom.

www.kn.pacbell.com/wired/BHM/AfroAm.html
An interactive treasure hunt through black history is only one of this site's great features. The superb Subject Sampler includes information, photographs and stories that help to bring black history to life. The section on the Tuskegee Tragedy, like the site's other excellent areas, is a terrific place for students to learn about important and difficult moments in history. ★★★

The Black Military History site profiles black American soldiers and their units.

BLACK MILITARY HISTORY
www.fatherryan.org/blackmilitary
Many people are aware of the 54th Massachusetts, a division of black soldiers who fought during the Civil War. But they may not be aware of the Tuskegee Airmen, the Harlem "Hell Fighters" and the 10th Cavalry, also known as the Buffalo Soldiers. This site gives short accounts of these military units and nearly a dozen other groups of black soldiers who bravely fought for this country. It also has a lengthy section of suggested readings. ★★★

STAMP ON BLACK HISTORY
library.thinkquest.org/10320
Using the United States Postal Service's commemorative stamps as a platform, this site for young people profiles important figures in black history. Biographies of influential people such as Booker T. Washington, jazz genius Thelonious Monk and boxer Joe Louis can be found in the alphabetical list; biographies are also conveniently arranged by curriculum area. Actual stamp collecting does get some attention here: Suggestions for using stamps in the classroom and a list of stamp dealers are provided. The virtual Black History Tour, a quiz, games and coloring pages round out this informative site. ★★★

WELCOME TO AFRICAN AMERICAN HISTORY
www.watson.org/~lisa/blackhistory
In a text-only, easy-to-read format, this site addresses five important topics in black history in sequence. Starting with the Dred Scott case and moving on to the civil rights movement and school integration, there is well-documented information on these subjects and a host of subtopics. The section on the murder of Emmett Till is particularly informative and well presented. A helpful citation guide allows visitors to link to other relevant resources on the Web. ★★★
